A MATTER OF PRIDE

BY JESS BENTON

THE SERGEANT at the recruiting desk agreed with young Jerry Morgan in almost everything—except the one thing that really mattered.

The sergeant said, "You've got the spirit we want and when the time comes there'll be a place for you. The way it is now—" he shook his head, "—well, you just keep on at the foundry. You're doing a big job there—a job that's just as necessary as flying a plane."

He looked again at Jerry's papers of application.

"I see you're studying chemistry," he said. "You just keep on going to school in the morning and helping to make the big guns in the afternoon. Don't think you're not doing your share, Jerry. You are."

"Look, sergeant," Jerry said earnestly. "I want to get in now and train to be a flyer so I can get over there with Win. That's my brother—Winston. We thought he was missing but he came back. He got decorated. Here—" he handed the sergeant another sheet of paper, "—here's a copy I made of his citation."

The sergeant read it through and handed it back to him.

"That's great, Jerry," he said. "You've got a right to be very proud of your brother. I know how anxious you are to get into it and maybe fly along with heroes like him. But it's as I say, the army makes these rules about age because the army knows what's right."

Jerry nodded sorrowfully and the sergeant smiled and patted him on the shoulder.

"Keep punching kid," he said, as Jerry gathered up his lunch pail and his papers. "Thanks for trying."

The guard said, "Hi, Jerry!"

as he went through the main gate of the foundry. He nodded a half-hearted greeting and went on through to the locker room. Mr. Hoffman was sitting there drinking coffee out of the cap of his thermos bottle and looking at the pictures of his son. At least, Jerry thought it was a picture and he thought it must be of his son. He had heard Mr. Hoffman had a son fighting in Europe.

He said, "Hello, Mr. Hoffman."

Mr. Hoffman put the picture in his pocket. He said, "Hello, Jerry. I see your brother Win got decorated again. Congratulations!" He emptied the balance of the cup of coffee on the floor and went out.

JERRY MURMURED a short "Thank you." Maybe Mr. Hoffman did know more about tempering steel than anyone else in the foundry, but Jerry wished he was a little more considerate of others. He got a mop and went over the floor. Mr. Hoffman might at least have spilled it in the sink. But that's the way it was with the older men, Jerry thought. You had to make allowances for them. Maybe they'd rather be fighting too. Maybe Mr. Hoffman wished he was over there in Europe, with his son.

Before he changed his clothes he took out the copy of Win's citation and looked at it again.

"By direction of the President," it read, "under the provisions of the Act of Congress, a Distinguished Flying Cross was awarded by the War Department to the following named officer: CAPTAIN WINSTON MORGAN, AIR CORPS, UNITED STATES ARMY. For heroism while participating in an aerial flight over the port of Cherbourg, France, in support of attacking ground troops..."

Jerry put the paper away. Win was doing great things over there, all right. Things that he, Jerry, would like to be doing himself. He was proud of Win. He wished he could do something that would make Win just as proud of him. Make Win really proud—in- stead of just carrying blue- prints from the main office to the foundry engineers.

It was a responsible job, right enough, and those blue- prints were important. It was the kind of job that carried him into every nook and corner of the vast plant—to the tool and die department, to the closely guarded drafting department, to the mighty furnaces where the steel was melted. Even into the shed where the cooling gun barrels were set to be tempered—where Mr. Hoffman ruled the roost, between his endless cups of coffee, with an iron hand.

It wasn't everyone who could be trusted with a job like that. And it wasn't everyone who could stand the work—the heat, the ceaseless clamor, the constant need for speed, speed, speed, the sustained pitch of excitement.

And today, Jerry gathered, there was more than the usual excitement. Something was cooking besides the steel in the vats. There was an air of added tension. Small groups of men stood, their heads close together, in serious talk. And then, when he went into the office of Mr. Rogers, the Plant Superintendent, he was stopped by three men he had never seen about the foundry before. Men in civilian dress, not workmen.

They asked him all sorts of questions—what his father had done during the last war, what he did with his spare time, why he studied chemistry in school. Then Mr. Rogers came in and told the men about his brother, Win, and the men smiled and told him to go on with his work.

Jerry was curious. He wondered about it until the shift was relieved and he found himself back in the locker room with Mr. Hoffman. There was more coffee spilled on the floor and Mr. Hoffman was just putting the cap back on his thermos bottle and as usual making a wry face and muttering about how tough it was to get some decent coffee.

Jerry ignored the messy floor. The men who had questioned him were still on his mind.

"Did you see those strangers around the foundry today?" Jerry asked.

"Yes," replied Mr. Hoffman. "I guess everybody saw them. They must have questioned everybody in the place. They were talking to me, too."

Jerry was puzzled.

"Oh," he said "Then I wasn't the only one. What's up?"

"Plenty," said Mr. Hoffman. "Plenty is up. Something deadly serious happened. At the proving grounds yesterday three gun barrels cracked with the first discharge. Three, mind you. Months and months of effort were wasted when those guns proved worthless at the first shot. And those barrels were ours. Made right here in this foundry!"

Jerry's mouth was a round O as he whistled "An accident."

Mr. Hoffman shook his head. "No-o," he said "That's why the men asked you those questions. They were Federal men." Mr. Hoffman took his coat from his locker. "It's sabotage—," he said "Well—I can't forget I've got a son fighting this war, too."

Mr. Hoffman started to put on his coat and something fell from the pocket onto the floor. It was the picture, and it fell face up. Jerry saw it was the picture of a young man in uniform.

"Your son?" Jerry asked.

"Yes, my son," Mr. Hoffman said proudly.

THAT NIGHT Jerry pushed aside his homework and looked at the big picture of Win on the table. Win, he thought, really looked handsome in his uniform. He remembered the picture of the other boy in uniform he had seen, Mr. Hoffman's son, Win, he decided, was better looking. Even his uniform looked better—Jerry suddenly sat bolt upright.

"Wow!" he exclaimed.

The next day when he got to the gun foundry Mr. Hoffman was not in the locker room and Jerry went right into Mr. Rogers' office.

"Can I speak to you for a moment, sir?" he said to the Plant Superintendent.

"Well, I'm pretty busy. Jerry, what with this trouble—"

"But that's just what it's about, sir, if I could just have a minute—"

"All right, Jerry," he said, "sit down."

"Well, sir," Jerry said excitedly, "it's like this. Last night when I was studying my chemistry and I remembered

The Federal men caught Mr. Hoffman at the railroad station. Later when he signed the confession he admitted he was trying to get away because he thought maybe Jerry had recognized the picture of his son.

There was a big story in the papers and Jerry was given the major credit for having smoked out the saboteur. He was pretty proud of the write-up but he was even prouder of the letter which, some time later, he got from his brother Win:

Dear Jerry (the letter read): I got a big kick out of the clippings Dad sent me about you and the Hoffman case. Great work, boy! Maybe you'd better plan on going into counter-espionage instead of the Air Force. It really took some masterminding to put all those odd facts together and make them add up.

Only a smart fellow who had studied chemistry and stuff like that, and studied hard, would know that spilling a little hot coffee down the cooling barrel of a big gun would make the finely tempered steel crack the first time the cannon was fired. Why, I didn't even know it myself! Of course when you told them Hoffman was always drinking coffee out of the thermos bottle he carried, and spilling it around all over the place, that made him a suspect.

But still, practically everyone in the plant drank coffee, and it could have been any one of them.

No—it was your telling them about the picture of his son that tied the whole thing together. I can't, even now, figure out how you accidentally seeing a picture of his son in uniform made Hoffman break down and confess. After all, these days there can't be anything too suspicious about a picture of a guy in an army uniform. I hear there are millions of them! Anyhow, Jerry, this is to say that you've really made me proud of you! Love from your brother,

Win

Imagine it, Jerry thought, Win proud of me for once!

Well, in his next letter he would explain it to Win. It was really pretty simple. The picture of Hoffman in an army uniform was different from the pictures he saw every day of men in army uniforms.

Because young Hoffman was wearing a German uniform.
